

Figure 4.17: The VI model demonstrates a simple example of visual search asymmetry: searching for a cross among vertical bars (A) is easier than searching for a vertical bar among crosses (B). Stimulus (top), model responses (bottom), and the  $s$  score for the target (in the center of each pattern), for the two examples. This pair of examples also demonstrates a well-known observation: a target is easier to find when it has an unique feature that is lacking in the distractors (e.g., the cross in A has a horizontal bar lacking in the distractors), but is more difficult to find when it is defined by lacking a feature present in the distractors (e.g., the target vertical bar in B is distinct only by lacking the horizontal bar present in the distractor crosses). By the VI mechanism, the horizontal bar in the target in A is the only one in the image to evoke a VI response that is not suppressed by iso-orientation suppression; the target vertical bar in B however suffers the same iso-orientation suppression experienced by other vertical bars.

(4.17)80. This observation is extracted as a rule in Treisman's Feature Integration Theory,<sup>70</sup> often used to define basic features in that theory. The VI mechanism provides a sound substrate behind this observation.

The influence of background variability on the ease of visual search

Fig. (4.18) demonstrates that, according to the VI model, a target's saliency decreases when the distractors are more variable, either because the distractors are irregularly positioned in space as in Fig. (4.18A), or because the distractors have different features, such as being differently oriented, as in Fig. (4.18B). Indeed, psychological experiments have found this rule that a target is more difficult to find when the background variability increase like these,<sup>71</sup> and it has been suggested that random background textural variability acts as noise and limits the performance of visual search.<sup>72</sup> By VI mechanism, two identical visual items have different contextual influences when their contextual surrounds are different, such that they should evoke different levels of VI responses. When the visual inputs are not spatially homogeneous, different visual items have different contextual surrounds. Consequently, VI responses to different background items are non-homogeneous. The
